Trump Drained the Swamp and Found His Cabinet at the Bottom: Elliott Broidy's Foreign Lobbying and Trump's Favors

Throughout the campaign in 2015 and 2016, the partisan lines went something like. From the right, we heard about how having a businessman outsider like Trump as President meant the country would do well economically. From the left, we heard that while Trump's inexperience in governing was sufficient cause for alarm, even conceding a businessman would govern well, Trump's business life was replete with scandals, lies, cheating and conniving. Further, the left argued, Trump is not fit to the job because he is as a person such a repulsive liar and conman. The right shrugged this off as the left being hysterical as usual. Turns out, the left was right, but was it?

My view of Trump has been somewhat changed as of late. Before I used to believe he was simply a buffoon who would hire competent people to shake up Washington a little bit. It very soon became clear he was as much an insider as Hillary Clinton, albeit with less political baggage. Trump became the very thing he railed against all those months leading up to what could be called nothing short of a miraculous electoral college victory in 2016. I have long argued that it is incumbent upon White people who care about our own future to reflect on what Trump is exactly and how we got him. How could a man so thoroughly rotten to the core become so beloved by a political constituency so complete bereft of representation?

My answer is twofold: capitalism and diversity, the linchpins of liberalism. The former controls the resources, the later controls the culture. Capitalism made the elites uninterested in their own population; they became rootless cosmopolitans more interested in advancing human rights, global faggotry and Chinese imperialism than protecting the middle class. Diversity made this cosmopolitan elite complete in their ideology: suffer the immigrants to come unto the neighborhoods I do not live in. In other words, flood White nations with browns and blacks while living in gated communities. The elites have endured zero consequences from their ideology. Its not their businesses burning down, or their daughters being raped, or their sons fight ZOG oil wars or their neighbors breaking into their homes.

I have attached several articles below about Trump's taxes, bribes, deals and Republican scams. The evidence shows that Trump is clearly paying less taxes than you, which is not evidence of his own personal corruption, so much as a system setup by those same rootless elites to enrich themselves by extracting from the plebs. The richer have never gotten richer than under Trump. Trump isn't draining the swamp: he is the goddamn swamp!
